Kapiti College to take part in research

Kapiti College will be a participating school in a new research project that will contribute to the government's goal of raising education standards, Education Minister Trevor Mallard announced today.

The research project into environmental education is being led by Dr Chris Eames from the University of Waikato's Centre for Science and Technology Education Research.

Entitled Investigating teachers' pedagogical approaches in environmental education that promote students' action competence, the study is based around a series of case studies of classrooms where coordinators will partner teachers to research classroom practice in environmental education.

The two-year study will be carried out in collaboration with schools and researchers in Northland, Auckland, Waikato, Wanganui, Wellington, Kapiti, Christchurch, and Otago and is one of 18 research projects under the Teaching & Learning Research Initiative (TLRI) announced today.

"The research projects announced today continue the important work our government is doing in the early childhood, school and tertiary sectors to raise education standards through supporting quality teaching.

"The research projects cover all aspects of teaching and learning, and allow the benefits of partnerships between education research experts and teachers to be maximised.

"Through these projects we can build on teaching and learning knowledge by enhancing the links between educational research and teaching practices so that these projects have outcomes that are of practical use to teachers and other educators."

The New Zealand Council of Educational Research has been contracted to manage the programme on behalf of the Ministry of Education. A team of specialists in key areas of educational research will manage the initiative and assist the researchers.
